And a renowned scholar seemed to have found a shortcut to deal with the looming 'bachelor crisis': foreign women.

????????????????????“????”????????

Mao Shoulong, a dean from the Renmin University, wrote in a newspaper column that more female immigrants should be encouraged to live and work in China, so that they would perhaps marry Chinese 'leftover men'.

Mao, a scholar, professor and sociologist, said that the government should allow more foreign women to live in the country, whose population is 1.3 billion.

The article was published today on The Beijing News, a publication affiliated to the Propaganda Department of the Municipal Party Committee of Beijing.

Mao claimed in the article that the recently launched two-child policy will not fully resolve the gender gap issue.

He then went on explaining the many issues the society will likely face if too many people are forced to live a single life, such as property and the ageing of population.

??

The man then said it's very difficult for the government to use policies to fill the gender gap.

????????????????????????????????

It is impossible on a technical and moral level to encourage people to give birth to baby girls, Mao wrote.

????????????????????????????????

To conclude his column, the man pitched some possible methods the government could use to deal with the 'bachelor crisis', such as to encourage more companies to offer marital service and to reduce marital cost.
